If there has been any change in the campus environment over the last 30 years that is more significant than the personal computer, it is the availability and evolution of the mobile phone. When cellular service was introduced in the U.S. in the early 1980s, it was a luxury; today mobile connections are a necessity. Not only do wireless consumers expect to be able to get voice calls, texts, data and video everywhere, they expect it quickly and without interruption. The demand for these services can be particularly high in environments like campuses, where there are high concentrations of people, many of them with smart phones and many of them in a generation that expects to communicate continuously and...
